WILKEN SKURKS Skulpturen Home, Nest und Tresor sind Visionen zum Thema Behausung. Trotz der unterschiedlichen Ausdeutungen sind alle drei Werke getragen von einer positiven, in sich ruhenden Grundhaltung. Home mit seinem dominanten blauen Glas kommt kathedralenartig daher. Die beiden Türme erscheinen wie Interpretationen der Schachfiguren König und Königin. Ihre Verbindung lässt das Zuhause zu einem sakralen Ort werden. Hoch aufragend wie eine mittelalterliche Trutzburg wirkt dagegen Tresor. Das weiße Opak-Glas unterstützt den wehrhaften Charakter. Spielerisch-heiter ist die Anmutung von Nest. Die eingeschlossenen Luftblasen verleihen dem durchsichtigen Glas Lebendigkeit.

DAFNA KAFFEMANS Wölfe „sind Einzelgänger, isoliert und autonom, nichts in ihrer Nähe duldet, eingebunden in ihr Umfeld und doch losgelöst“, wie Henrietta Brunner schreibt. Sie sind Jäger und werden selbst gejagt. Ohne Behausung, ohne Ort des Rückzugs, sind sie schutzlos, auf sich selbst gestellt. Man würde ihnen einen sicheren Ort wünschen, wo sie der allgegenwärtigen Gefahr entkommen und Ruhe finden könnten.

WILKEN SKURK'S sculptures Home, Nest and Tresor (Strong Room) embody visions of the theme of dwelling. Despite their divergent approaches, all three works are sustained by an essentially affirmative tenor of inner repose. With its dominant blue glass, Home resembles a cathedral. The two towers could be reinterpretations of the king and queen figures of a chess set. The bond that joins them transforms this structure into a sacred place. In contrast, Tresor (Strong Room) soars upward like a medieval fortress. This defensive character is underscored by the use of opaque white glass. Nest makes an impression of playfulness, serenity. The internal air bubbles endow the transparent glass with vividness.

DAFNA KAFFEMAN'S “solitary wolves are treated in autonomous isolation - they don't tolerate anything nearby. At the same time they are both connected and disconnected to their neighbors” as Henrietta Brunner writes. They are simultaneously predators and prey. Homeless, lacking a place of retreat, they are vulnerable, compelled to fend for themselves. One wishes they could enjoy a safe haven, a place where they could escape omnipresent danger and find peace.
